The past fights dirty.

No head butts, groin strikes, or eye gouges--MMA heavyweight Woodshed Wallace thinks they're taking all the fun out of fighting.

He also thinks he's beaten his criminal past, but the past fights dirty. Woody's stuck on no-name cards fighting for gas money when Banzai Eddie Takanori--president of MMA's largest organization--offers him a last minute fight against a highly favored poster boy.

By the time Woody realizes he's a pawn in a high stakes game between psychopaths, he and those he loves are in way too deep.

Good thing he can take a punch.

And give a few back.

Excerpt:

Muscle memory from all the way back to fighting in the empty swimming pool kicked in. I started to pace and survey the floor, if you could call it that. There was standing water in the corners, enough to drown a man if I could get on his back and push his face down.

The footing's terrible, so nothing fancy. Short, hard punches.

I shook out my arms.

Forehead into nose, temple. Again and again.

I rolled my neck.

Elbows into throat, knees into groin.

I pulled my left knee up toward my chest, then my right.

Don't let him grab hold, because he won't let go. He's bigger and stronger and a black belt in jiu jitsu.

He was watching me, staring me down.

Don't put your eyes on me. I'll close them for good.

I would make it out.
